

I would like to recommend you diversify your reading material...You should read C.S. Lewis's "Mere Christianity" and "The Space Merchants" by Fredrik Pohl and C.M. Kornbluth. Lewis makes a very interesting analogy re: The average person looks in the mirror and sees small faults and imperfections, where as the truly evil person looks and sees absolutely nothing at fault.

Would this be, could this be you? Years from now, if I were you, I would not want to read "The Space Merchants" after having participated in what is about to be done and ever look in the mirror again...I suggest you take a step back, a couple of deep breathes, read these two books over the summer. And take a little more time to think about it.

Sincerely Yours,

Dennis Graham
